Response of Vocational Students to Supervision: Effects of Reinforcing Positive and Negative Attitudes Toward Different Supervisory Roles

The way people think about disability affects the care and education of PWDs. Myths and misconceptions about disability are common. Promoting negative images of disability is a form of discrimination because it creates barriers to full citizenship for people who have a disability. There are many stereotypes or images associated to PWDs and these stereotypes labeled on PWDs have had very negative influences on the way they are educated.

Unfortunately, contrary to what many might think, disability does not mean a poor quality of life; it is often the negative attitudes of society and the lack of accessibility within the community that are the real tragedy. People with disability cannot lead a productive and a fulfilling life.

To determine students’ social-perceptive attitudes toward their future profession, the authors employed the following three diagnostic assessment methodologies: - Choice of Profession Questionnaire, drawn up by the authors based on an analysis of scholarly publications on student motivation for the choice of the profession. This can lead to desired outcomes (success). Research has confirmed that high levels of self-efficacy have a positive social effect (e.g., better health (mental and somatic), greater achievements, and better social integration). The authors assumed that a high level of self-efficacy should facilitate boosts in the intensity of future pedagogues' professional orientation. What are the positive and negative effects of education on our society. Read more about the pros and cons of education in this essay.

Lack of wisdom

The modern education system is all about getting loads of garbage into a little mind. It expects a student to complete huge portions and that’s what students are doing but in a wrong way. Rote memory is being stressed on rather than the creative one. This is one of the saddest aspects of modern society. We have knowledge but no wisdom to use it. To quote John F. Kennedy, The goal of education is the advancement of knowledge and the dissemination of truth.
